EXPANSION TO CARING FOR CAREGIVERS TAX CREDIT FILED

Rep. Tammy West (R-Oklahoma City) is aiming to expand eligibility and qualifying expenses for a first-in-the-nation tax credit.

West’s House Bill 4118 would eliminate the current age minimum for eligible family members. Currently, eligible family members must be at least 62 years old. Additionally, the bill would add mileage for medical appointments to the list of qualifying expenses.

“Unpaid family caregivers shoulder enormous responsibility, often at significant personal cost,” West said. “This bill removes unnecessary barriers so more Oklahomans can access a tax credit that recognizes the real financial sacrifices caregivers make every day. By expanding eligibility and recognizing mileage for medical appointments, we’re making this tax credit reflect the realities families face.”

The tax credit is capped at $2,000 per year for most participants, but individuals caring for veterans or those with a dementia-related diagnosis will receive up to $3,000. According to the AARP, family caregivers spend around $7,200 annually caring for a family member.

“By expanding this tax credit, lawmakers can offer meaningful relief for Oklahoma caregivers who spend thousands of dollars each year to care for loved ones,” AARP Oklahoma State Director Sean Voskuhl said. “Broadening eligibility helps lighten the financial load so caregivers can focus on what matters most which is caring for their loved ones.”

In 2023, the Legislature approved the Caring for Caregivers Tax Credit, designed to help offset some out-of-pocket expenses incurred by unpaid family caregivers. The credit took effect in 2024, and Oklahomans could begin claiming it on their 2025 tax returns. The Oklahoma Tax Commission reported over 100 returns claimed the credit during its first year.

HB4118 is eligible for consideration in the upcoming legislative session, which began Feb. 2.

OMRF to study how exercise benefits older people with multiple sclerosis

A year ago, Oklahoma Medical Research Foundation scientists launched an ambitious, five-year study aimed at understanding what makes some people over age 60 respond differently to exercise than others.

Now, thanks to a grant from the Presbyterian Health Foundation, a pilot project seeks to answer the same question in older people with multiple sclerosis. The funding will enable an important collaboration between OMRF researchers who study aging and clinician-scientists who work with MS patients in OMRF’s Multiple Sclerosis Center of Excellence.

In MS, the body’s immune system mistakenly attacks the myelin sheath, a protective layer covering nerve fibers. The damage disrupts nerve signals, leading to a range of problems that include muscle weakness, balance and vision impairment, cognitive difficulties, and fatigue. The disease affects more than one in every 500 Americans.

Not that long ago, physicians typically advised MS patients to avoid exercise, fearing the resulting body heat would trigger the disease and cause extreme fatigue. Only in the past 30 years has conventional wisdom switched, said Bobbette Miller, Ph.D., a neurologic physical therapist who will coordinate the new study.

“Most existing studies involve people with MS under age 60, and those studies show that exercise actually improves fatigue,” said Miller.

OMRF clinicians will identify 10 current MS patients age 60 and above. All patients who volunteer to participate will undergo a supervised 12-week exercise protocol that involves both cardiovascular and strength training.

“We have limited medical experience treating older MS patients,” said Gabriel Pardo, M.D., director of OMRF’s MS Center of Excellence. “What we learn through this study will give us insight into how to implement the right strategies to improve function and quality of life.”

Benjamin Miller, Ph.D., who leads OMRF’s Aging & Metabolism Research Program, applied for the grant for this study. He hopes the results will lay the foundation for a larger study of how exercise can benefit older MS patients.

One important aspect will examine monoparesis, or single-leg weakness, a common symptom of MS caused by neurologic damage. Participants will undergo muscle biopsies to determine whether working out improves this condition, said Certified Physician Assistant Jennifer Smith, who will assist with the study.

April Stuart, the Presbyterian Health Foundation’s director of grants and programs, said PHF funded project because it “connects strong science with real patient need.”

“By building on an existing clinical trial and the expertise of the MS Center of Excellence, this study creates an important opportunity to better understand how people age with multiple sclerosis and to develop more personalized guidance for maintaining strength and function,” Stuart said.
