RSU AI

Richardson emphasized the platform's ability to bridge academic learning and professional practice.

"Organizations increasingly seek graduates who can think critically, solve complex problems, communicate effectively, and make informed decisions in rapidly changing environments," Richardson said. "Simulance AI provides students with opportunities to develop these competencies through realistic executive simulations and interactive learning experiences."

Initially developed for business education, Simulance AI was designed with broad applicability across academic disciplines, including STEM, healthcare, public administration, entrepreneurship, information technology, and workforce development.

Simulance AI represents an original contribution to educational innovation through its novel integration of AI technologies and experiential learning principles. Beyond its immediate educational applications, the platform serves as a growing faculty-led research and innovation initiative exploring how artificial intelligence can enhance experiential learning, leadership development, critical thinking, organizational decision-making, and student engagement across multiple academic disciplines.

Developed through the Rogers State University Innovation Lab, Simulance AI provides a foundation for continued research, innovation, and educational applications that support student success through AI-enabled experiential learning. University officials are exploring opportunities for continued development, research collaboration, intellectual property protection, external collaborations and broader educational and industry adoption.

The hardware necessary to complete this project was made possible through the support of Brian Reeves, director of information technology for Academic Computing Services at Rogers State University.
