Advocates push bill to eliminate NDAs, statutes of limitation in child sexual abuse cases

Tres Savage
Nondoc.com

Spurred by a national effort and a local survivor, legislation to invalidate non-disclosure agreements in child sexual abuse cases and eliminate the statute of limitations for prosecuting such crimes faces concerns in the Oklahoma State Senate after passing the House unanimously.

HB 4227 advanced from the House 80-0 in March and has been assigned to the Senate Judiciary Committee. If passed and signed, it would help Oklahoma lose a dubious distinction as one of only six states that statutorily prohibits the prosecution of child sex crimes after victims reach a certain age — 45, in Oklahoma’s case.

After following the topic for “several years,” Rep. Chris Kannady (R-OKC) authored the bill after being approached by a pair of advocates for the related causes. An attorney, Kannady said he has represented child sexual abuse victims and that non-disclosure agreements are wholly inappropriate in such cases.

“We can’t let a person or an organization hide behind an NDA, because the person who is the victim should have the right to tell their story,” Kannady said. “And No. 2, the general public needs to know when these things happen, just to protect our kids from these terrible acts of society.”

Cindy Clemishire and Elizabeth Carlock Phillips are familiar with society’s terrible acts. The two women met three years ago through an attorney who thought Clemishire’s efforts for justice against a prominent pastor might be aided by Phillips, the advocate and Texas philanthropist behind Trey’s Law, a national movement to prohibit NDAs in child sexual abuse cases.

“This is about bringing light to darkness,” said Phillips, whose brother completed suicide after signing an NDA about the abuse he endured at Kanakuk summer camp. “Every meeting I’ve had with legislators and leadership in Oklahoma, they agree that this needs to happen, and it needs to happen this session. It’s something we can do for kids in this moment to make the world a better place for children who have already endured the unimaginable.”

Clemishire, an Oklahoman whose revelations helped lead to the October plea deal taken by megachurch pastor Robert Morris, said it took her almost 20 years of living with what she experienced between ages 12 and 17 “to understand that it was abuse.”

“My story went public when I was 54,” Clemishire, now 56, said during a recent interview at the Oklahoma State Capitol. “Most victims are not prepared to come forward. I think the average age for every victim to come forward is maybe 52. (...) We just need to give victims the opportunity to have the courage, have the understanding — whatever is necessary for them to go through to be able to come forward if they want to.”

But Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Brent Howard sees the statute of limitations question differently. In his mind, requiring prosecution by a certain time after the victim becomes an adult should encourage them to come forward faster.

OKC man charged in fraud scheme

A federal grand jury has charged Matthew McLain Veazey, 36, of Oklahoma City, with wire fraud, money laundering, and aggravated identity theft, announced U.S. Attorney Robert J. Troester.

According to public records, from June 2021 through December 2025, Veazey held himself out as an experienced and successful financial investment professional and induced friends and family to send him money by claiming he had special access to favorable investment opportunities due to his connections and prior employment with investment companies. Despite promising to invest funds on behalf of his victims or to include them in his own claimed investments, Veazey allegedly kept the money for himself and used it for personal expenses.

Court records allege that investors transferred at least $2,385,000 into Veazey’s personal checking accounts, funds that were never repaid. It is further alleged that Veazey fabricated text messages and email communications from real people to convince victims that his investment activities were real and legitimate.
