25 Years on: Remembering 9/11 at the Hilltop

Heather Katz
Contributor

This Friday marks twenty-five years since the attacks on September 11th, 2001. SWOSU will be hosting an event open to the public in commemoration of this milestone at the Fine Arts Center on that day at 5 pm. (For details, please see SWOSU's website or contact the Office of Public Relations and Marketing at 580.774.3063.)

There are numerous ways to reflect on the quarter-century since the attacks on the Twin Towers and the Pentagon, and the thwarted attack on a federal building in Washington, D.C., made possible by the heroic passengers and crew of UA Flight 93. In honesty, readers, I started to recount these ways in detail, but I found that I became bogged down by the sheer scope of it. These events continue to impact individuals, families, and communities not just immediately in the path of these attacks but across the country and around the world.

Some of these details will doubtless be addressed during Friday's commemorative event. Instead, I would like to use the opportunity afforded me in writing this column to reflect on an attribute of America that seems buried today in the deep political divides permeating almost all aspects of our lives: love for community and patriotism.

I have taught many introductory politics courses in my nearly 20-year career. A trend I have noticed over that time is that students seem less apt to come into such classes with solid understandings of the basic differences among political viewpoints or comfort navigating current events. The reasons are likely more complex than I can gather from my own observations, but part of this trend is that uneasiness comes from seeing the fallout from political disagreements that boil over into everyday lives. Hyperpartisanship results in an animosity that can cause family rifts, fights with neighbors, and even the personal sacrifice of some of our principles in the name of fitting into our party identity. Think, "You're not a true Democrat/Libertarian/Republican if you don't agree with x…" Students have told me as much. As a result, they stay away from anything that could stir up resentment among their family and peers, even the most mundane of things, like keeping up with the news.

I bring this to your attention to remind us that among the youngest Millennials (the generation's youngest were born in 1996) and those born after can never recall a time when this was not true. While the politics of my youth were never without controversy (the Clinton sex scandals stand out the most), they did not do much more than the hope that come election time, those involved would be removed from office.

The attacks on September 11th appeared from out of the blue for most Americans, and for the hours and days that followed, there was no partisan blame. Perhaps we have become numb to such finger-pointing after national tragedies today associated with mass shootings, assassination attempts, natural disasters, and the like. Instead, the earliest explanation I remember about 9/11 is that the attackers were extremists who "hated our freedom."

Patriotism is a complex phenomenon that can have positive and negative. But on that day, during the rescue efforts that followed, and the outpouring of support for the victims around the country and world, we saw one of the best versions of American pride in my lifetime.

I grew up within sight of the New York City skyline. Personally, I still cannot watch the worst of the footage from the attacks. I still become emotional when hearing the audio clips of the witnesses on the ground in and around Manhattan. For days, along with millions of other Americans, I watched the recovery efforts unfold on television. I watched as university peers slowly came to accept that their missing loved ones were lost to them forever.

A wall filled with cards from loved ones in honor of those lost during the 9/11 attacks.

But I also watched us unite despite the calamity. Consider the hundreds of Americans from every state pouring into Ground Zero to assist with rescue efforts. The makeshift memorials not only in Manhattan, but also those that sprang up on overpasses and in neighborhoods far outside sites affected by the terrorists. Even television, sometimes reflecting the worst of us, would not deign to mock or even make light of events unfolding around us.

Recrimination would come, eventually. The political aftermath of the attacks, both foreign and domestic, will doubtless continue to be studied as part of the makeup of America in the 21st century.

As the midterm elections of 2026 draw closer to us, I don't imagine that the boundless sympathy and love for every American displayed twenty-five years ago will make a sudden reappearance. Perhaps, however, we can remember that it is possible. I think we owe it to the children who will need to learn how to navigate their world, including their political one, as they grow into future leaders.
