Local state reps
commend SNU
students' food drive

Reps. Marilyn Stark, R-Bethany, and Tammy West, R-Oklahoma City, presented a citation this week to students in Southern Nazarene University's international management class in recognition of their recent food drive benefiting local families facing food insecurity.

Students in the class collected more than 1,000 nonperishable food items this semester as part of a service-learning project that connected course lessons to community need.

The idea began after the class learned about a local family struggling with food insecurity due to the loss of their SNAP benefits. What started as a simple donation drive quickly grew into a campuswide effort to meet a real and urgent need. "The students' commitment to serving others is truly inspiring," Stark said. "They saw a need close to home and stepped up in a meaningful way."

Constant criticism keeps defining Okla. Co. jail trust

Matt Patterson
Nondoc.com

Public meetings rarely rank atop most people's list of exciting times, but those who follow the travails of the Oklahoma County Criminal Justice Authority are sometimes rewarded with moments worth paying for, even if admission to the meetings is free.

In a dizzying, sometimes shambolic, two-hour meeting Nov. 10, the body commonly known as the "jail trust" filled two key leadership positions, had one member accused of being transphobic in connection to his recent arrest, and saw another walk out mid-meeting to resign.

When county leaders created the jail trust to take over day-to-day operations of the troubled detention center in July 2020, the machinations of Monday's meeting likely would not have been on anyone's vision board. But jail trust meetings have been eventful before.

In early 2021, members of the public had to be separated by deputies in an altercation that involved a racial slur used by a member of the audience toward Jabee Williams, an OKC artist and entrepreneur. Around the same time, the trust had to review an embarrassing voicemail left accidentally by then-jail administrator Greg Williams. Other meetings have featured obscenities and protests, while the trust's membership has become a revolving door of appointment and departure featuring prominent members of the community.

When it was conceived, the Oklahoma County jail trust had been intended to provide transparency and competent management to what was already an aging, deeply troubled facility that the Oklahoma County Sheriff's Office had run for its entire 30-year history.

But those troubles have continued, with the jail becoming infamously deadly. All but two of the trust's nine members, Oklahoma County Sheriff Tommie Johnson and District 3 Commissioner Myles Davidson, are volunteers not paid by the county. There have been six chairpersons, including Joe Allbaugh, who served in that capacity during two separate stints before stepping down a second time in May. In all, there have been about 30 trust members since its inception five years ago. The jail has also had four CEOs during that time, with the latest, Paul Timmons, resigning in September amid controversy over an alleged physical confrontation involving two staff members.

For their trouble, trust members are forced to navigate an underfunded jail constantly starved for competent staff and a storm of criticism from members of the public as they address what must feel like an endless, whack-a-mole loop of problems.

Holman named the latest jail trust chairman
Citing other time commitments, Steve Buck stepped down as chairman of the jail trust Nov. 10. Buck, who this summer called for a self-evaluation of the trust's activities and effectiveness, said he will remain on the trust through the conclusion of his term, which ends April 30.

Oklahoma County jail trust members then chose Jim Holman to be their next chairman. Longtime trust member Derrick Scobey, a pastor who had been suggested as a potential chairman candidate, will serve as vice chairman.
